HUMAN RIGHTS POLICY

Introduction

Human rights in Afghanistan are a sensitive issue as political systems have been severely weakened by war over the years. Since 2014, the country has experienced further instability, resulting in many people fleeing the country.¹ Conditions have worsened in the last two years.² Women and children continue to be particularly vulnerable, and do not have any legal protection to speak of.³ To any organisation working in this context, protecting human rights becomes a fundamental issue.

Mahboba's Promise recognises its responsibility to respect international human rights standards. It is committed to upholding this responsibility within its organisational structure, with stakeholders and in all its projects and activities. It acknowledges the importance of protecting human rights in Afghanistan, where most of its projects are located. It aims to assist and empower vulnerable groups through projects designed to uplift them.

Purpose

The purpose of this policy is:

1. To affirm that human rights are central to our values: All the projects and initiatives that Mahboba's Promise is involved in have a human rights approach. It does not undertake or support projects that violate human rights or discriminate against any group or section of society.
2. To maintain stakeholder expectations: The people and organisations involved in our work expect demonstrated commitment to human rights issues, which this policy aims to address.
3. To identify policy gaps and risks: The human rights policy acts as a framework through which all the existing and potential projects and policies can be examined. Any potential impact on people's lives through the organisation's activities can be easily identified as a result.
4. To demonstrate good company practice: Both international and Australian standards require a commitment to certain values for the effective administration of development and humanitarian aid.
5. To trigger learning and management capacity: A policy can raise awareness and understanding of the organisation's human rights impact among staff and management. This in turn can trigger further insights and increase managerial capacity.
